Around 1960 the paradigms for city planning were radically changed. Modernism became dominant and the invasion of motorcars took off. In this process the care for the people using cities - looked after for centuries by tradition and experience - was completely left behind. Cities for People became an overlooked and forgotten dimension. This is the story told by Jan Gehl, in his book "Cities for People" which goes on to describe why looking after people is crucial for the quality of old as well as new cities in the 21st century. City transformations and mobility strategies from Denmark, USA, Australia and Russia will serve as examples of this new people oriented direction in city planning.
